

Allowing ATT to purchase T-Mobile will further increase the market control in the current ATT/ Verizon oligopoly which sets the standards in the wireless arena.

ATT's claim to increase bandwidth coverage by decreasing the competition in purchasing cell towers is a farce. This competition for cell towers should drive a competitive firm such as ATT into researching alternative methods for effectively delivering bandwidth to its consumers.

ATT's arrogance in believing that the FCC will allow this deal to pass is prevalent in regards to their deal with TMobile. As you know, TMobile will receive $3 billion dollars from ATT and part of their spectrum. Tmobile's ostensible last stand to gain a share of the US monopolistic wireless market relies on the sensible decision of the FCC to break up ATT yet again to increase wireless competition and force ATT to research new methods of bandwidth distribution rather than purchase competition.

Clearly, ATT will be the biggest winner should it succeed. Not the American wireless users. Not TMobile.
